

On 7 July 2014, the graduating class from the Department of Geography together with their friends, family and loved ones gathered together for what could be their last time at the department's Earth Lab. For many alumni, this moment was especially poignant as this was the place where it all started. The Earth Lab was where the graduates had their first tutorial in Geography, and bookending it with a farewell tea session in that very same room was a symbolic way of bringing to an end an exceptional and amazing four years in Geography. While the professors served drinks to the friends and family of the graduates, everyone was treated to an address by A/P T. C. Chang and a short sharing session by two other graduates. Following that, alumni, friends and family were ushered outside for some light refreshments and the alumni took the opportunity to bask in each other's company – as a class – for one last time.
